RESEARCH INTERESTS

My research focuses on understanding a wide range of forest phenomena at varying scales to inform forest management and climate smart forestry by combining in situ forest measurements and experiments with big data techniques and remote sensing. I currently study temperate liana (woody vine) ecology, impacts, management feasibility and benefits, and distributions using field experiments as well as satellite and UAV remote sensing. I am also involved in guiding several projects with masters of forestry and PhD students. These projects range from mapping and understanding biomass changes in forest fragments surrounding cocoa plantations in Ghana, understory regeneration in teak plantations in Ghana, Sal forest cover change in Bangladesh, the effect of fuel reduction treatments on wildfire severity in California, and street tree diversity in urban canopies of New England.
